

Just after purchasing a Fujifilm X-Pro1 camera for a trip to New York, I watched the film Finding Vivian Maier. It was a life changing experience. My instant reaction was "That's what I want to do." Up until that moment I had never heard of street photography. I immediately started to practice and research the genre. Finding Saul Leiter's work was also an epiphany. Seeing his pink umbrella photo changed my whole approach to photography. His painterly quality elevates photography to an art form. If photography is art, there are no rules. This revelation released me to take photographs I like. I no longer felt any pressure to conform or seek approval from other people.

My Glimpses project came about when I noticed that many of my street photos contained one person or part of a person in an interesting environment. I think it gets to the core of what photography is about. We all see thousands of people in our lives; most of whom we will never see again. Photography captures that fleeting moment.
